DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The MANOR is a two and one-half storey frame house dating from the very early twentieth century. Its style is a blend of the Colonial revival and the Romanesque revival. The shingled walls are sheltered by the wide eaves of a mansard roof having its lower slope at a pitch standard for many hipped roofs, its upper slope only a bit shallower. Those wide eaves shelter a shallow round turret at the south-west corner. A one-storey porch extends across the principal or south front with a low pediment centered above the principal entrance; it extends around the west side with a radius drawn from that of the southwest turret. A pair of 4/1 windows is above the principal entrance and another pair is in the easterly bay. Two pedimented dormers, each with a pair of nine-light casements, are in the roof and brick chimneys rise near each end of the ridge. A wing of equal height and similar shape, with similar exterior detailing, extends to the north behind the easterly bays.

A wide central hall has a fireplace on its east wall. Principal rooms flanking it also have fireplaces, all with Colonial-revival detailing recalling the late eighteenth century. A large open stair at the north end of the hall has massive paneled square newels with three large turned balusters per tread supporting a moulded rail, details which recall the late eighteenth century but with medieval proportions.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The simple lines of the MANOR recall the American Colonial style but this example retains features from the recent Romanesque revival.

Garrison Forest School opened on September 25, 1910, and fifty boys and girls were greeted by the first headmistress.¹ By 1912 increased enrollment led to a search for new quarters. At the Green Spring Valley Hunt Club a small group of area men (including Lawrence M. Miller, Frederick C. Todd and Redmond C. Stewart) met for dinner, formed a stock company and bought a large frame house, stable and 20-25 acres for the new site of the school. This house, built during the 1890's, was named Manor House and has contually served as the hub of the campus.² Today students live on the second floor with resident faculty. On the first floor are sitting rooms for faculty and students, the dining room, the Suzanne White Whitman Riding Room, and the Athletic Offices.
